I. INTRODUCTION.

A. Post-graduate Employment.

Ideally, when an employer extends an offer for post-graduation employment, the offer will include a written document detailing salary and benefits. Most written offers are sent as PDF email attachments. Many employers, particularly smaller law firms, may be less formal in extending offers and provide only a verbal offer of employment. It is appropriate for you to request that the employer provide a written offer. If you feel uncomfortable making this request, you should at minimum email the employer a statement of your understanding of the offer and the terms to which you are agreeing.

B. Law Clerk/Summer Associate/Intern Position.

It is most common that employers will not include a written offer for law clerk/summer associate/intern positions. The exceptions are often larger law firms and corporations with written offers most commonly being sent via email. When accepting a law clerk position, it is equally prudent to confirm in an email or other written communication your understanding of the terms of the position.

II. TIMING.

A. Consider the Offer.

An offer of employment for a post-graduate position requires you to make a very important decision. Decisions are not nearly as weighty when accepting a law clerk or temporary position. When given an offer for an attorney position, avoid the temptation to accept a job offer on the spot. Instead, take time to review your options. Weigh your choices carefully and evaluate each opportunity and how it fits with your career goals. It is important you consider your options and that you have your questions answered before committing to a part-time or full-time job. If you are given an offer and you know it is the position you want, and you feel you are well informed regarding salary, benefits, work expectations and responsibilities, you can accept immediately. If you are not prepared to make a decision when the offer is extended, you should express enthusiasm for the position and the employer and then inquire as to the deadline for accepting or declining the offer. Always acknowledge receipt of an offer within 24 hours of it being received or extended.

B. Requesting Additional Time.

You have the option of requesting additional time to consider an offer, although understand that employers are not obligated to grant such requests. In addition, some employers will express disappointment when you ask to have additional time. Small law firms, for example, often state a strong preference for students making decisions within a few days.
If/when you request additional time to consider an offer, do not seek career counsel from the offering employer. While it is appropriate to inform the employer that you are considering other options and would prefer two weeks to do so, it is not appropriate to explain the timelines of other employers, why you really want to wait to hear from other employers, etc. Employers do not care about your job search; they care about hiring the best candidate. And the “best candidate” is in part the individual who is really excited about the opportunity, not the individual who needs three weeks to see where the chips fall with other firms.

If you are active in a job search and have future interviews scheduled and/or are waiting to hear from employers with whom you have already interviewed, you may find yourself in a quandary of needing to accept or decline an offer before you know all your options. In this instance, we strongly encourage you to meet with a member of the CPC’s professional staff. They will walk you through options and etiquette. We do not recommend relying on guidance from family, friends, or individuals outside the legal community.

The members of the National Association for Law Placement (NALP) – law schools and legal employers – have developed Principals for Fair and Ethical Recruitment Process that provide “suggested best practices designed to ensure the highest standards of professionalism, fairness, transparency, and non-discrimination.” These principals guide law school recruiting policies – including those of Marquette Law School – that pertain to employers seeking to recruit law students. Marquette Law School’s Recruiting Policies for Employers, which are set forth in Appendix B of this guide, are designed to create an environment in which students have sufficient time to make informed career decisions and employers can rely on receiving responses within a reasonable time. We encourage you to review and familiarize yourself with these standards. Note, however, that while many legal employers abide by these policies, particularly large law firms, many do not.

III. ACCEPTING A JOB OFFER.

A. Call or Write?

While you certainly can accept an offer by telephone or in-person, an acceptance should always be confirmed in writing. It is common for employers to communicate written offers through email, but some still mail hard copies. It is best to respond in kind with your written acceptance.

B. The Acceptance Communication.

Even though you secured the job, it is still important that you impress the employer as to reaffirm that they made the right choice. The acceptance letter or email communication should be brief, consisting of three short paragraphs. See Appendix A for sample acceptance letters.

First Paragraph. The first paragraph should contain the formal acceptance of the job offer.

Second Paragraph. Confirm any employment details such as salary, where you will be working, start date, housing matters, etc.
Third Paragraph. Reiterate your enthusiasm for the job and that you look forward to working with the employer.

C. Do NOT Rescind.

It is not appropriate to accept an offer and to then continue with your job search. Once you have accepted a job offer, you should withdraw from all interviews and inform other employers for which you remain a candidate that you no longer wish to be considered for the position. Professional circles are small and memories long. It is unprofessional and unethical to accept a job offer with the intent of continuing an active job search and rescinding your acceptance should you receive a different offer.

IV. DECLINING A JOB OFFER

A. Call or Write?

As with acceptances, it is appropriate and professional to decline an offer by telephone with formal follow up in writing if circumstances suggest a written follow-up is necessary.

B. Tips for Declining a Job Offer.

When declining an offer, keep the following in mind:

• Avoid saying anything negative about the employer, even if you had a negative experience interviewing.

• If you choose to decline an offer because another offer is a better fit for your interests, strengths, and goals, it is fine to state this, though it's unnecessary. Do not, however, provide details about why the declined offer is not the best fit. Indeed, try to avoid providing any specifics at all. Doing so simply gives the employer a chance to counter your rationale and, in some cases, even criticize your decision.

• You need not state which offer you accepted, though you may do so if you wish.

• Be professional and courteous.

C. The Decline Communication.

Only two or three brief paragraphs are necessary for the purposes of a decline letter/email. Sample decline letters are provided in Appendix A. It is rare to mail a hard copy letter declining a job. Most common is a phone conversation and/or email communication. When sending an email, it should be structured as follows:

First Paragraph. Thank the employer for the offer and the opportunity.
Second Paragraph (or part of first paragraph). State that you are declining the offer. Depending on the course of the conversation, you may tactfully and briefly explain in general terms why you are declining, but it's not necessary to do so. Your explanation should be no more than a simple statement that you accepted an offer that was a better fit or that your job search has gone in a different direction. If appropriate, consider reiterating your interest in the employer.

Third Paragraph. Express your appreciation for their interest in you.
