And she did. After graduating from Marquette Law School in 1992, Zimmer began her career as an assistant district attorney in Richland County, Wisconsin. Then came a move to the Waukesha County Corporation Counsel’s Office, where Zimmer represented the interests of the public in CHIPS (Children in Need of Protection or Services) and termination of parental rights cases. This experience of dealing with the dynamics of child abuse prepared her well when she then became an assistant district attorney in Milwaukee, focusing on child abuse prosecution. Zimmer’s next move was to Chicago, where she was appointed as an assistant attorney general for the State of Illinois.

“Throughout these various positions, I was very fortunate to work in the company of many skilled and dedicated prosecutors,” recalls Zimmer. “Prosecutors at many times have a thankless job. They do not get paid for the real amount of work that they do, and they have to witness the many evil things people do to each other. Despite this—or maybe because of this—they continue to serve the public. I admire them.”

During Zimmer’s time in Chicago, an opportunity arose at the National Center for Missing and Exploited Children (NCMEC) in Washington, D.C., and she accepted the position that she now holds: Deputy Director for the NCMEC’s Office of Legal Counsel. Zimmer provides technical assistance to prosecutors around the world who are battling against the staggering amount of child pornography and sexual exploitation. She also assists with and presents technical training seminars, supports the development and production of resource materials for prosecutors, and provides case-specific analysis and support.

“Being a prosecutor for so many years helped me develop an understanding of the dynamics of prosecuting crimes against children,” notes Zimmer. “I am very fortunate to be part of NCMEC because it gives the victims of child sexual exploitation and others a voice and a mechanism to be heard by law enforcement officials, prosecutors, judges, and legislators.”

Zimmer’s particular position provides her the opportunity both to offer legal advice and representation to the staff of NCMEC (from responding to subpoenas to assisting in protecting intellectual property and proprietary interests) and to help the organization undertake new initiatives, all while protecting NCMEC’s grant of immunity provided by Congress.

Looking back, Zimmer regards her career as a journey, guided by a bit of divine providence, the first step of which was her education at Marquette. Zimmer says that Marquette instilled in her a sense of justice. “To me, justice is not some lofty ideal that can never be obtained. It can be achieved in small ways by our making a difference in individual lives. I remember my first day at law school, when Dean DeGuire talked of being a ‘Marquette lawyer’ and how this spoke to such matters as developing a sense of personal responsibility to uphold the best aspects of the legal profession and the importance of public service.”

During her career protecting the most innocent, Zimmer has learned that it is vital to have passion about one’s undertakings, whether in a career or more broadly in life. “Being passionate about the issue of child sexual victimization has kept me going through the long hours preparing for trials, seeing so much victimization, and dealing with the frustrations of the criminal justice system. I feel that I contribute to making a positive difference in the lives of children and their families.”

A Marquette lawyer, indeed.

Michael Cramer, L’78, has come full circle: back in school nearly 30 years after he graduated. But this time he is on the other side of the lectern.

Cramer recently joined the faculty as a full-time clinical assistant professor at the Preston Robert Tisch Center for Hospitality, Tourism, and Sports Management at New York University’s School of Continuing and Professional Studies. “I am teaching what I know and what I have done,” says Cramer. “When my students and I discuss some of my real-world experiences, we can talk not only about cases, but about outcomes, ethics, and both what was done and how it was done.”

Working hard and taking advantage of the right opportunities at the right time, Cramer has had a wide-ranging career. Most recently, he was the executive vice president and chief administrative officer of Pinnacle Foods Corp., a multibillion-dollar food conglomerate. He joined Pinnacle in 2004 after a phone call from a former partner and longtime chairperson of a number of companies in which the two were involved. “The businessman-friend asked me if I was interested in participating in ‘one more deal,’” Cramer relates.

At the time, Cramer had been in Texas almost six years, serving as president and chief operating officer of Southwest Sports Group, L.L.C., and Southwest Sports Realty, L.L.C. In those roles, he served at various times as president of the Dallas Stars hockey team and the Texas Rangers baseball team.

“This opportunity to return to a private-equity/distressed-business situation was appealing to me,” Cramer explains. So, by joining forces with two strong private equity firms and an established company with impressive brands, he was able to help turn the ailing company around. The result was a $2 billion company that was stabilized and recently sold to the Blackstone Group.

Cramer had experience in the field. He previously had been a founding partner of C. Dean Metropoulos & Co. (CDM), a private investment and management firm that operated and managed several publicly and privately held consumer companies. These included The Morningstar Group Inc., International Home Foods, Inc., Ghirardelli Chocolate, and Stella Foods.

This is not the way Mike Cramer started his career after law school. He began in the profession in Milwaukee, working for several years with Steve Enich, a 1949 Marquette Law School alumnus who had encouraged Cramer to apply to Marquette for law school. Then, in the late 1980s, Cramer opened a practice with several of his law school friends.

Although Cramer thereafter entered the corporate world, as sketched out above, he remains close to his classmates and is very involved in a number of the Law School’s undertakings. He is on the advisory board of the Law School’s National Sports Law Institute and is serving on his class reunion committee, happily sharing stories of bygone days with his fellow classmates (he says that you know who you are).

“We had a wonderful class full of great characters, and we had a lot fun together,” says

At age 74, Don Levy has no plans to retire from his full-time law practice. “Well, maybe,” he says—when asked whether he might some day consider it—“if I get old!”

After graduating from Marquette Law School in 1960, Levy joined his brother already in practice to form the firm of Levy & Levy in Cedarburg, Wis. Levy focuses primarily on family law as well as real estate and business law. “There are rewards and challenges every day,” he says. “I’m privileged to have an opportunity to help people solve problems, to do things for them they can’t do for themselves.” He is humbled that this tradition has spanned nearly half a century and is proud that he even has some fourth-generation clients. “I have clients now whose great-grandfather was my client.”

Levy has been recognized for his expertise as an attorney. He has been listed annually in America’s Best Lawyers since 1987 and noted as well by Milwaukee Magazine as one of the metropolitan area’s best family lawyers. Levy has lectured on family law topics before state and local bar associations and is a fellow and past president of the Wisconsin Chapter of the American Academy of Matrimonial Lawyers.

But Levy has interests beyond the law. He is especially dedicated to his local community. For example, he is currently chairing a committee to operate the Rivoli Theater in Cedarburg and to restore its 1936 Art Deco marquee and façade. In 1975, he helped to form the Cedarburg Landmark Preservation Society and now serves as its president. The group led the effort to ensure that Cedarburg’s historic Grist Mill (1855) was spared destruction. The mill is now the focal point of the historic downtown district.

Other interests include Cedarburg’s public library, the Cedarburg Performing Arts Center, and St. Mary’s Ozaukee Hospital, where he serves as board president. Levy’s ongoing efforts within the community earned him in 2002 the Greater Milwaukee Foundation’s Frank Kirkpatrick Award, which honors individuals who enrich the lives of Milwaukee-area residents through physical and infrastructure development. Levy and his wife, Janet, were recently honored with the Cedarburg Foundation Civic Award for their volunteer and community service within the Cedarburg area.

Even so, Levy’s involvement in Marquette Law School as an alumnus well antedates the school’s own building initiative. “I am very appreciative of the Law School, and I owe a great debt of gratitude,” he explains. He has shown his appreciation in a variety of ways; he is a past president of the Law Alumni Association Board and is a longtime member of the executive committee of the Law School Advisory Board.

Levy has seen significant positive changes made at the Law School since his graduation in 1960. “There was just one female student in my class back then,” he remembers. “I have been impressed with the continual improvement over the decades with regard to the quality of education the school provides.”

But the biggest change, he believes, is yet to come. “The Marquette Law School is going to tier. We have outstanding leadership and now with a new facility planned, we have a great future ahead of us,” Levy says. “Upward we go!”

The Levys have three grown children and eight grandchildren.

Vivian Torres's route to the legal profession was scarcely typical. It began when her family escaped from Cuba in 1961 and came to the United States with only the belongings in their suitcase. Her father escaped first, disguised as a priest because Castro was expelling the religious. Torres, her mother, and sister followed shortly thereafter under the ruse of visiting a sick uncle in New York. They received a hardship visa and never returned. Those acts of courage and faith allowed—and required—Torres and her family to begin anew.

“Neither of my parents could speak English, and my sister and I were then just four and five years old,” explains Torres. Despite these obstacles, they not only persevered, they flourished. “We left behind everything we had to start a better life.”

Torres, a 1983 Marquette Law School graduate who is now presiding judge for the Medina County Court at Law in Hondo, Texas, recalls her early years. Her father (who recently passed away) worked three jobs to support their family, which first settled in Amarillo, Texas. “He worked as a typesetter, at a drive-in movie theater, and as a dishwasher at Pizza Hut,” she says. A diligent worker, he was soon promoted and accepted a position managing a Pizza Hut first in Amarillo and then was again advanced, this time to district manager in La Crosse, Wis., where the family then moved.

This move subsequently presented an opportunity for Torres’s father to become a franchise owner. Eventually, he sold his interests to Pepsico, at which time his company owned more Pizza Hut franchises than any other privately held entity in the United States.

When the family moved to La Crosse, Torres was 12 years old and still gaining fluency in English. Torres gratefully recalls a teacher who kept Torres by her side and gave the young student extra attention so that she could learn English more easily. After graduating from high school in La Crosse, Torres attended Marquette University both as an undergraduate and for law school.

“When I graduated from law school in 1983,” Torres relates, “I had several opportunities available, but my dad’s company needed in-house help. So for several years, I worked in Del Rio, Texas, and then in San Antonio, helping him acquire overseas locations for Pizza Hut franchises.” The experience opened many doors for Torres and gave her an opportunity to work with many prominent and well-respected attorneys in various fields of the law.

In 1988, Torres entered private practice and joined a small firm in Texas, where she made partner quickly (indeed, within the first year). The firm eventually grew to five partners and six full-time staff. Torres decided to run for Texas County Court at Law and in 2003 won a seat. The jurisdiction handles a wide variety of misdemeanors and all family-law cases in the area, as well as probate and some civil cases. In short, Torres is busy.

But the position offers many rewards. Chief among them is the opportunity to intervene in an appropriate way with children and families. “Every day I have a chance to assist in custody decisions and provide early intervention with juveniles in the criminal justice system,” Torres says. Torres is also very involved in the professional development of her colleagues and frequently speaks to the Texas State Bar Family Law section. “I concentrate on encouraging and training others regarding pro bono family service. We have such a direct need in our community,” she relates. There is no public defender program in her court, so judges rely on private lawyers to take court-appointed cases for those who cannot pay. Torres also has special interest in preventing domestic violence. “I hope that I am giving back to a country that has given me so very much.”

Although Torres is far away from Wisconsin and Marquette, she recalls her Marquette education often. “Ethics are such a significant part of practicing law,” Torres says. “My experience at Marquette taught me a lot in that regard.”

Torres is impressed with the Law School’s renewed efforts to reconnect with its alumni. “I am sure that this is also a reflection of how the school treats its current students,” she says. “This positive trend will serve to contribute to the Law School’s continuing success.”

Torres notes that she especially looks forward to connecting with her classmates at their 25-year class reunion in 2008.

Paul Dacier, L’83, is living his dream. As a child, he always wanted to be involved in the business world; his Marquette Law School education helped him get there.

Today, Dacier successfully melds legal expertise with business acumen, as he serves as Executive Vice President and General Counsel of EMC Corporation. EMC, a worldwide developer and provider of information infrastructure technology and solutions, has its headquarters in Massachusetts. It posted revenues last year of $13.23 billion and has more than 37,000 employees.

Dacier looks back on the many stepping-stones that paved his way to his present position, beginning with his involvement in Boy Scouts. “I became an Eagle Scout as a teenager, which opened a lot of doors for me,” he says. “I stayed involved as an adult and became president of the Knox Trail Council in Framingham, Massachusetts.” The council was 10,000 strong and provided Dacier an opportunity to “be prepared” for leading a company three times as large.

Dacier also acknowledges his six years as an attorney with the former Apollo Computer, Inc. (later acquired by HP) and a prior year at a small Milwaukee law firm as vital building blocks for his present position at EMC. Dacier oversees more than 70 legal professionals and aggressively defends the company’s interests regarding proprietary data storage technology. He joined EMC as corporate counsel in 1990 and was promoted to general counsel in 1992, to vice president in 1993, to senior vice president in 2000, and to executive vice president in 2006.

This Marquette lawyer’s responsibilities with EMC are broad-ranging. He must be well versed in the legal aspects of the company, while also being savvy concerning its business operations. He is responsible for the worldwide legal affairs of the company and its subsidiaries, and he oversees the company’s internal audit, real estate, and facilities organizations, as well as its government affairs and aviation departments.

Dacier is committed as well to public service. In 2003, he was appointed by Governor Mitt Romney as a member of the Massachusetts Judicial Nominating Commission for a three-year term. In 2006, Governor Romney also appointed Dacier as the presiding officer in the proceedings to de-designate (or remove for cause) the chairperson of the Massachusetts Turnpike Authority, who was in the hot seat for management of a tunnel project whose collapse killed a woman.

Dacier is involved in other community activities as well. For example, he is a trustee of the Social Law Library, one of the oldest law libraries in the United States, located in Boston in the John Adams Courthouse. He has received numerous awards, including being named one of the top ten Massachusetts lawyers in 2005 by the Massachusetts Lawyers Weekly. And Dacier and his wife, Kim, are busy parents of three children.

The legal education underlies the various professional undertakings. “My Marquette Law School education has served me well—it taught me how to analyze the facts, identify the most important issue, and advise accordingly,” Dacier says. “It challenged me to develop my critical thinking and writing skills, which are necessary for every businessperson or lawyer.”

Dacier looks to the future of the Law School with enthusiasm. “Marquette Law School is in very capable hands,” he says. “Dean Kearney is vibrant, insightful, and strategic. I look forward to helping him continue his efforts with the Law School.”

While a law student and supervised fieldwork intern with Centro Legal on Milwaukee’s South Side, Jessica Marquez Murphy, L’07, received her assignments and set out to accomplish them. Not an hour into her first day as an intern, she headed to the courthouse. Marquez Murphy submitted child support papers, filed a summons and petition for a divorce, and requested pretrial dates in two courtrooms. Nearing the end of her day, Marquez Murphy reunited with her supervising attorney, Linnea Matthiesen, L’03, for the most nerve-racking task of all. Under the watchful eye and guidance of Matthiesen, Marquez Murphy made her first appearance of record under the student practice rule in a stipulated-divorce case.

A little more than a year later, now a lawyer herself, Marquez Murphy works side-by-side with Matthiesen at Centro Legal, a nonprofit law firm providing legal representation in the two largest areas of low-income litigation—family law matters and misdemeanor criminal defense. Both Marquez Murphy and Matthiesen agree that the agency’s principal differentiator is the firm’s cost-sharing model, where in most cases the client pays a portion of the fee. “In two years and over 150 closed cases later, I have had only two clients fail to show up for a hearing, and both called to tell me beforehand,” adds Matthiesen.

Marquez Murphy and Matthiesen credit Marquette Law School for providing them abundant opportunities for practical experience. Marquez Murphy explains, “I was fortunate to enroll in the substantive law classes that I wanted, including all of the family law classes, the child abuse seminar, the domestic violence workshop, and the restorative justice program. More than anything, though, the Law School allowed me to learn outside of its walls.”

And learn she did. Marquez Murphy volunteered with the Boys and Girls Club, served as a Public Interest Law Society fellow at the Task Force on Family Violence, and interned at Legal Action of Wisconsin and, ultimately, at Centro Legal. While still a law student, Marquez Murphy gained an understanding of the plight of low-income women and children, especially when domestic violence is present. Marquez Murphy knew that she wanted to combine her various experiences and her substantive legal knowledge to aid domestic violence victims. Centro Legal provided her the opportunity.

In her last semester at the Law School, Marquez Murphy helped to author a grant application to help fund Centro Legal’s family-court representation of victims of domestic violence. “Unfortunately, because domestic violence is a common matter among our clients, there is an overwhelming need for this project,” Marquez Murphy explains. United Way recently approved the grant.

Referrals are made to the project from the District Attorney’s office and domestic violence support organizations. Nearly all clients are at-risk individuals who need a safer and more stable home life to avoid slipping into a crisis situation. Before she had worked for even six months with Centro Legal, Marquez Murphy could count 35 individuals as her clients, a reflection of the high caseload at Centro Legal.

Of course, Marquez Murphy is not alone at the project. As a family law attorney focusing on guardian ad litem appointments and divorce cases, Matthiesen works closely with Marquez Murphy to provide a variety of services to the project’s clients. “With the United Way grant, we are now able to assist domestic violence victims through a divorce, if this is desired, help implement safety plans, and make referrals to other community agencies when necessary,” relates Matthiesen. Both Matthiesen and Marquez Murphy also work with new supervised fieldwork interns from Marquette, who help Centro Legal tackle its large caseload. “I am eager to share my experience and knowledge with them,” says Marquez Murphy.

Centro Legal’s executive director, Chris Ford, feels the same way. “We need more folks, whether students or lawyers, like Linnea and Jessica,” he says. “Some very fine individuals are emerging from Marquette Law School.”
