

Providing Coast-to-Coast Legal Expertise

Eric Van Vugt didn't set out to achieve an unusual career goal, but he succeeded. He realized several years ago that he had been involved in legal work in 49 of the 50 American states. The one not on the list? Maine. Without Van Vugt's seeking it, a short time later one of his clients asked for help on a legal matter—in Maine, of course. Van Vugt had completed the full set, so to speak.

More important than the geography of his legal work over 38 years, Van Vugt is able to look back, appreciate his good fortune, and say, "I have nothing but great feelings. . . . What a great career." His work, primarily as a litigator, has been rewarding, and he's had great colleagues and clients.

He is also able to look forward eagerly. A partner at the Milwaukee-based firm of Quarles & Brady, he has been transitioning into a newly created position at the firm: general counsel. More law firms are creating their own general counsel's offices as the firms recognize, with their growing size and complexity, that they have many of the same legal needs their clients have, Van Vugt said. He has continued to work with some of his previous clients, but his main emphasis now is "having basically 450 lawyer clients," dealing with issues such as liability, regulatory compliance, and cybersecurity. "It's a good time and a logical transition," he said.

Van Vugt grew up in western Michigan and met his wife, Wendy, when both were students at Calvin College in Grand Rapids. She was from the Chicago area, and, when he decided to go to law school, they agreed to focus on choices within range of Chicago. One reason for picking Marquette Law School was the scholarship help he was offered. He said he appreciates to this day what that meant to him, and one result is his and Wendy's generous support of scholarship funding at Marquette Law School now.

Van Vugt figured that he would spend the three years in law school in Milwaukee and then move on. But he and his wife decided Milwaukee was an appealing place, and, with the help of Professor James Ghiardi, he was offered a position with a local law firm. The 1970s were “the heyday of the litigator,” Van Vugt recalls, and his practice went well. He joined a different law firm in 1986, which merged in 1991 with Quarles. Van Vugt developed specialties including issues related to aviation and public pension plans.

Beyond his duties with the firm, he is an avid traveler. He has been able to combine his professional and personal interests in trips such as one he took this past spring to Honduras as part of a group of lawyers advising that country’s local bar on enforcing land title laws.

Van Vugt said that the fast start he got to his practice—he was trying a case in court a month after graduating— isn’t likely to occur in today’s much-changed world. But he is confident that career paths offering important and exciting work for new lawyers are still out there. That’s another reason for his continuing support and encouragement for the students at Marquette Law School today. ■

Congratulations to the following Marquette lawyers, inducted as members of the Class of 2013 into the Fellows of the Wisconsin Law Foundation. This honorary program recognizes a select number of lawyers for their high professional achievements and outstanding contributions to the advancement and improvement of the administration of justice in Wisconsin.

Davis Positions Herself for Success On and Off the Job

It seems in character that Cindy Davis has excelled even when it comes to relaxation.

It's been eight years since she became a Marquette lawyer, and in that time she has thrived in three positions where high-quality work was expected—first as a clerk for Wisconsin Supreme Court Justice David T. Prosser Jr.; then as an associate working on business law matters in the home office of Foley & Lardner, Milwaukee's largest law firm; and now as a prosecutor in the Milwaukee County District Attorney's office.

Each position has brought demands and pressures. Although she handled them well at work, Davis wanted outlets to balance her life. She turned to yoga about five years ago—or as she put it in a written piece, “Yoga found me . . . at a time when I was simply looking for a way to relax from the stresses of everyday life.” She wrote, “Yoga has been my safe-haven during both the good times and the bad and has empowered me through not only increased physical strength but also increased mental and spiritual strength.”

The yoga studio became, as Davis put it, “my home away from home, my club.” She became a certified instructor one year ago at YamaYoga studio, working with classes of 5 to 10 people one evening a week.

Davis described her year working for Justice Prosser as a great experience that combined many of her interests in the law. She spoke highly of her time with Foley & Lardner as well. “But my true passion was more with criminal law,” she said, so she joined the staff of Milwaukee County District Attorney John Chisholm in January 2011. Chisholm told her when she started that his central expectation is for prosecutors to “do the right thing.” That instruction has stuck with her as she has worked in the drug, domestic violence, and child protection units in the district attorney's office. “It's worked out very well,” Davis said. “I feel I'm giving back to the community in which I grew up.”

Davis gives back to the community in her personal life as well. In addition to her yoga instruction, she is on the boards of Brookfield Academy, the school she attended from kindergarten through 12th grade, and First Congregational Church of Wauwatosa.

Davis's grandfather was a prominent lawyer in Milwaukee—he was the (Walter) Davis in the Davis & Kuelthau law firm, founded in 1967. Although her father, the late Stewart Davis, went into business, by the time Cindy Davis was in middle school she had developed an interest in becoming a lawyer. That led her to Marquette Law School, where she served as editor-in-chief of the Marquette Law Review. Davis remembers her student experiences not only for the training they gave her but also for the sense of warm community among faculty members and students and the ways the philosophy of cura personalis was given meaning and life.

Davis is reluctant to speculate on what is ahead for her. But it is clear that it will involve pursuing her commitment to work that serves the community and fulfills her own drive to do well. And, when it comes to her personal life, it will include ways to enhance her strengths, the way her yoga practice does. ■

From Small-Town Iowa to a Los Angeles Law Practice, Via Marquette Law School

Peter Roan didn't set out to be a successful lawyer with a specialized practice in Los Angeles. He started out as a public defender in Milwaukee, without a clear long-term plan.

But things have worked out differently and well—and that underlies the advice he has for law students now. In short: Aim to develop a specialty.

"I kind of fell into it," Roan said of his own specialty, health care litigation. He no doubt understates the work and knowledge that have gone into building his practice and, in recent years, led him to join Crowell & Moring, a 500-lawyer firm with offices around the world. But, Roan suggests, his advice reflects how the legal world has changed since the 1980s, when he started his career.

"There's always a degree of serendipity," Roan said, in anyone's life and career path. For him, the path started in Traer, Iowa, a town with a population of about 1,800 during his childhood. From there it led to the University of Iowa, where he got his bachelor's degree. After that he set his sights on law school and considered several, including Marquette Law School. "I just liked the feel of the place," he recalled. That feeling remained during law school: He remembers both working hard and having fun at Marquette.

Roan participated in the Public Defender Clinic in law school, and after graduating in 1985 accepted a position as an assistant public defender—a job that he greatly enjoyed. But when his then-girlfriend said she was moving back to her native southern California, "that sounded to me like a splendid idea."

In California Roan joined a small law firm. "When I started, I did anything that came in the door," Roan recalled. Increasingly, clients in health-related businesses were the ones coming in that door. The firm grew over the next 18 years to about 50 lawyers, with a significant health care focus.

The health care world kept changing, and those changes have produced much litigation over the years. Another large change in the health care industry is underway now, of course, with implementation of the new national health care law. As Roan put it, a large number of people and organizations have been working hard on the front end of the new law—aiming to get the licenses, contracts, systems, practices, and policies in place to implement the law. "I'm kind of on the back end," which he said means that when things unravel or parties have disputes, he gets more involved.

Overall, Roan said, a lot of the things that young lawyers used to do as they started out, such as document review, are in declining demand because of technological change and outsourcing of services. Clients are looking for lawyers who know "everything there is to know" about a specific industry or field. "You're trained as a generalist, but you need to be a specialist," he suggested.

Roan still has ties to the Midwest, including family members who live in the region. An important remaining tie: "I'm still a Packers fan, and I have a share" of the stock the football team sold a few years ago. But he enjoys his life with his wife and two teenage daughters in a town near the California coast.

As much as the legal world is changing, Roan remains optimistic about prospects for those starting out. He said, "My advice for law students is to take action, not to hang your head." ■
