JESSICA POLINER describes herself as passionate about gender inclusion in the workplace. The introduction to a recent book she coauthored lists some of the problems that she has confronted as a professional who is a woman, including “[t]he difference in gender pay, the different language used to reference women in career and performance discussions, and the number of smart, talented women opting out of the workforce or leadership.”

The problems aren't always created intentionally. Poliner says that she has often worked with men who want to do the right things in professional terms, but who, in one way or another, fall short.

That led Poliner, L'06, and Bonnie Fetch, a colleague, to write a book aimed at such men. (Un)Skirting the Issues: A Guide for the Well-Intentioned Man in Today's Workplace was published in 2017 by Lioncrest Publishing.

Poliner and Fetch offer advice and observations to help WIMs—their term for “well-intentioned men”—handle gender-related issues better. The purpose of the book, they write, “is to make unconscious gender bias more conscious. . . .

It is only when we make bias more conscious in our daily interactions that we can make a dent in its troubling impact in the workplace.”

Poliner grew up in the Milwaukee area. After graduating from Marquette Law School, she worked for a law firm and in corporate law offices where she said gender bias was subtle but present. She transitioned into executive positions in the construction equipment industry. She rose within Caterpillar, Inc., to a leadership position in its Latin American business. In 2017, she became vice president and general manager of Thermo King, an Ingersoll Rand company, in charge of transport of refrigerated cargo in Latin America. She is now on her way to Brussels to run a global business for Ingersoll Rand.

Poliner sees herself on a mission to reduce the presence and impact of gender bias in the workplace. She is passionate about the subject and is hopeful that the book will help individuals and organizations engage with it.

RACHEL LINDSAY: NOT JUST THE BACHELORETTE

Millions of people know Rachel Lindsay as “the bachelorette” in the spring 2017 season of the popular reality-television show of that name. But if you look at her LinkedIn profile online, she is identified only as “Attorney at Law at Cooper & Scully” in Dallas. And for many who were her teachers or classmates at Marquette Law School, she is Rachel Lindsay, L’11.

In two recent visits to Eckstein Hall, Lindsay made clear her commitment to continuing to be a practicing attorney, not just a reality-television celebrity.

In a program in Eckstein Hall on November 27, 2017, for interested law students, Professor Andrea Schneider interviewed Lindsay about how her legal skills helped her negotiate and deal with her television appearances.

Lindsay described her contracts with ABC and how she approached her family (her father is a federal judge) and her boss at Cooper & Scully about taking time away from the practice and the firm, first as a contestant on The Bachelor and then as the star of The Bachelorette. She said she told her boss that she was committed to her legal career and that being on the show would help promote the firm. He was supportive.

At the invitation of Professor Paul Anderson, Lindsay returned to Eckstein Hall on February 28 to be one of the judges of the National Sports Law Institute’s annual intramural negotiation competition and to speak with sports law students. One of her fellow judges was Bud Selig, commissioner emeritus of Major League Baseball and longtime distinguished lecturer in sports law and policy at Marquette Law School.

Lindsay, who is from Dallas, attended college at the University of Texas at Austin. She told Schneider that she chose Marquette for law school because she wanted a more intimate education setting and had a strong interest in sports law. On her initial visit, she hit it off with Marquette professors she met. Her connections with the Law School remain warm after seven years of practice and a rise to nationwide celebrity.

WHOM DO WE SERVE? EVERYBODY.

EXHIBIT A: Our students

Marquette Law School's timeless goal is to help students develop themselves into lawyers. A key facet of this is to prepare them to serve their communities. In May, 162 students will receive their hoods as graduates—and more than half will wear honor cords for pro bono service as students.

EXHIBIT B: Law professors

Hundreds of law professors, especially those focused on legal writing, will head to Eckstein Hall for the Legal Writing Institute's biennial national conference July 11–14, 2018. We are honored to host this conference focusing on a core component of legal education and one of our academic strengths.

EXHIBIT C: The public

The Marquette Law School Poll is the gold standard for measuring public opinion in Wisconsin. Turn to the poll for insight into the election races and sentiment on public policy topics, especially as November approaches.
